Adsorptive heat pipes, which are known to be used to remove heat from a heat sink such as a CPU, a display panel or the like, are in wide use as one of the solutions for heat removal. They are provided with an evaporator for absorbing heat, a condenser for radiating the heat into air, and a working fluid that is received in a closed space and is boiled when absorbing the heat from the evaporator in the heat absorption process and is turned into a liquid state when radiating the heat from the condenser in the heat radiating process. They utilize capillary action to force the liquid working fluid (dynamic fluid) in the evaporator to move to the condenser, and have an advantage that they have a large heat transfer coefficient between the evaporator and the condenser. However, the conventional adsorptive heat pipes have a problem in that, when the heat pipe is operated, an area of the heat pipe in contact with the evaporator and a contact area of the evaporator with respect to the heat pipe become small, so that there is a reduced exchange of heat between the evaporator and the working fluid. If there is only vapor phase working fluid in the evaporator, the latent heat of vaporization becomes large, and the thermal efficiency is reduced to cause vaporization heat loss. To solve this problem, proposed is a heat pipe in which a small amount of liquid working fluid is retained in the evaporator and the liquid working fluid is supplied from the liquid working fluid storage portion of the evaporator to the evaporator through a small heat transfer surface (refer to Japanese Patent Laid-Open Publication No
