I want to start the program once and it should run all these functions automatically according to a condition. How is this possible in C++ and what does it require? A: Use cron for this. Just write a small program that runs your c++ program that will trigger cron to run it at intervals. Look for crontab to see how to do this. A: If the code you're describing is in C++, you can probably write a thread. #include using namespace std; void function1(); void function2(); int main() { function1(); function2(); } void function1() { cout Q: Cross-browser support for Dynamically generated text-links I'm trying to create a page that displays a
