The show's premise is pretty simple. Peggy Carter is the first female Secret Agent in the history of the US. She has to be resourceful. She has to be tough. And the first time she saves the world, it happens in part because she stops a bullet with her top and bottom teeth. Like, really. I had a similar experience when I watched the Pilot of the Marvel Cinematic Universe. Iron Man was a billionaire who was always getting in over his head. He had a ton of junk to take care of. He was resourceful. He was tough. And he did it all by himself. As the series progressed, I came to realize that Tony Stark was very relatable for men and women alike, across all demographics. He was geeky, he was enthusiastic, he loved people, and his motto was "With great power comes great responsibility." He was exactly what every superhero should embody. I think that the MCU characters have been a great example for us to follow, but we also need to look beyond that. You need look no further than Peter Parker to understand that a hero is more than just what they have or what they can do. You also need to look beyond the physical aspects of a hero. Any superhero worth their salt has a witty personality, reliable friends, and at least a modicum of humor. Heroes are active listeners and empathetic human beings. They are resourceful and, sometimes, they make mistakes. They try to make up for those mistakes by having relationships that are meaningful and make them better people. And who will Captain America look to for inspiration? For me, it's Steve Rogers. He may not be her best friend, but he's definitely the 6d1f23a050
